HISTORICAL NOTE

This work has appeared over the years in parts, some with the title Dictionary of the Irish language (D-degóir,) E and F), the remainder as Contributions to a dictionary of the Irish language. The relationship between the two is explained in what follows.

The early history of the undertaking was dealt with by R. I. Best in his ' On recent Irish studies in the Academy ', an address delivered to the Royal Irish Academy on 25 February 1946 and later published as Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy Section C No. 2. This is the main source of information for much of what follows, though of course the later years have been dealt with on the basis of personal knowledge.

The Dictionary was first projected at a meeting of the Irish Archæological Society held in November 1852. The beginnings were slow and consisted mainly in the preparation of plans, projects and memoranda. The original idea was that the work should be carried out by the two foremost Irish scholars of the day, John O'Donovan and Eugene O'Curry. Unfortunately both of these were dead by 1862, and only their several individual efforts remain, O'Donovan's in the form of his supplement to O'Reilly's Irish-English dictionary (new edition 1864), O'Curry's in manuscript in four large volumes in the Academy archives.

Before he died O'Donovan had outlined his ideas of what the Dictionary should be and the lines along which it should be compiled. The main basis was to be a thorough excerpting of the older Irish MSS. and of such other texts as were available. The meanings of words were to be supported by citations. Etymology was not to be attempted apart from derivation within Irish itself and the giving of sources of loanwords. These directions have in fact been adhered to in the work as eventually compiled.

A further pronouncement of O'Donovan's has proved to be only too true—' This task can hardly be performed in our time, and it will be found that the workmen will break down before it is half done.' He can, however, hardly have foreseen the long delay which would ensue and the number of workers who would die without seeing the results of their labours in print. Nor can he have foreseen the particular direction the work would take. It would seem that in the early days Irish was looked on as a seamless garment for lexicographical purposes. But by the time publication of at least some of the Dictionary became imminent it had been agreed that the first requirement was to deal with the older language, and the first fasciculus to be issued added to Dictionary of the Irish language the words ' based mainly on old and middle Irish materials.' And although Marstrander, the editor of this fasciculus, makes reference to modern Irish forms, this was not continued, and the Dictionary remains for all intents and purposes a dictionary of early Irish.

After the death of O'Donovan and O'Curry little immediate progress was made, and it was not till 1880 that a further important step was taken. This was the appointment of Robert Atkinson as editor. In Irish studies Atkinson is chiefly remembered for his massive and still extremely useful glossaries to the official edition of the Ancient laws of Ireland and to his editions of the Passions and homilies from the Leabhar Breac and Keating's Three shafts of death. But in spite of the energy and expertise which must have gone to the making of these lexicographical aids little apparent progress with the Dictionary was made during the twenty-seven years of his editorship, from which he retired in 1907.

During the years from 1900 to 1907 Whitley Stokes and Kuno Meyer had published the three volumes of the Archiv für celtische Lexicographie, and to these were appended Meyer's Contributions to Irish lexicography, described as a ' collection of words . . . the outcome of about twelve years' desultory reading of Middle- and Modern-Irish books and manuscripts.' This extends only from A to DNO, and was by no means intended as a full-scale dictionary. On Atkinson's retirement Meyer took over the direction of the Dictionary, the Archiv ceased publication, and lexicographical work proceeded under the editorship of Osborn Bergin.

The School of Irish Learning had been founded in 1903, and from then till its incorporation in the Royal Irish Academy it held summer courses in Irish and Welsh given by distinguished scholars from overseas. In addition, continuous instruction had been given by Osborn Bergin. When in 1910 Bergin was appointed to a chair in University College, Dublin he was succeeded in the School of Irish Learning by the Norwegian scholar Carl J. S. Marstrander who, at the early age of twenty-seven, had a wide acquaintance not only with Irish but also with a considerable range of other Indo-European languages.

This was three years after the retirement of Atkinson from the editorship of the Dictionary. It was seven after the death of the Reverend Maxwell Henry Close. Close's main scientific interests had been mathematics, geology and archæology, but to these he added a vast enthusiasm for the Irish language, being a member of the Society for the Preservation of the Irish Language for some twenty-five years and at the time of his death a vice-president of the Society and its treasurer. And when the Society found itself in financial straits, as it frequently did, Close was in the habit of coming generously to the rescue with funds out of his own pocket. It is therefore not surprising that at his death in 1903 he left to the Academy a sum of £1,000 to defray the expenses of printing an Irish dictionary; albeit with the proviso that if some portion of the dictionary was not in print within ten years of his death the money was to be withdrawn.

In 1911 Meyer was appointed to succeed Heinrich Zimmer in the chair of Celtic in Berlin, and Marstrander was put in charge of the Dictionary. He was faced with two major difficulties, each working against the other. The first was his determination to produce a dictionary on the grand scale and on much more ambitious lines than those envisaged by Meyer. The second was that in order to retain the Close legacy it was necessary that something should appear by 1913. Both difficulties were surmounted. The story is briefly as follows.

On 14 August 1913, exactly thirty days before the tenth anniversary of Close's death, the first fasciculus of the Academy's Dictionary of the Irish language was published. It contains the letter D as far as the word degóir (a ghost-word, as Marstrander points out), for it had been decided to begin with this letter, A, B and C being fairly well provided for in Meyer's Contributions, though in fact Marstrander did not get as far as Meyer in the letter D. The prefatory note makes no mention of Close.

Marstrander's D, as it has now come to be called, was vigorously attacked by Meyer, who in his Zur keltischen Wortkunde 75 (1913) published a note 'Irische Unnamen' in which he dealt with some twenty personal names as given by Marstrander showing them to be ghost-words. This he followed up with a general review of the work in Zeitschrift für celtische Philologie x (1915). Here Meyer acknowledged the energy with which the whole work had been put together and the individual articles worked out, the care with which all available material had been collected to help in the solving of difficulties and the attempt to correct the mistakes of others. But he criticised Marstrander severely for setting himself a more ambitious task than was warranted by the existing state of knowledge, for the wasting of space by accumulations of identical and over-long examples and for the inclusion of much that was irrelevant, quoting on the way Goethe's 'in der Beschränkung zeigt sich erst der Meister.' To these remarks he added twenty-one pages of corrections and additions, and the review is dated 'am Tage der Eroberung von Antwerpen.' In those early years of the 1914-1918 war it was difficult to prevent patriotism from clouding the milder issues of scholarship.

According to a report on the School of Irish Learning in Ériu x Marstrander suffered a severe illness in 1911, and in 1912 was forced by continued ill-health and other commitments to resign his post in the School of Irish Learning. But there can be little doubt that at this time, as a result of disagreement about the scope of the Dictionary, relations between him and other Irish scholars became very strained. The prefatory note to Fasciculus E states simply that 'Professor Marstrander, owing to the difficulties of communication occasioned by the War and to other causes, relinquished the editorship.' Marstrander himself has stated (in a review in Norsk Tidsskrift for Sprogvidenskap v 366, see also below) that 'it was the differences of opinion concerning the scope of the dictionary which in connection with my appointment to the chair of Celtic languages in Oslo caused my relinquishment of the editorship.' At all events he departed to Oslo, and except for a short visit in 1917 he did not come to Dublin again till 1936, when he received an honorary degree from the University of Dublin. His last visit was in 1959, when he was doyen of the first International Congress of Celtic Studies.

In Revue Celtique xxxvii (1917-1919) Marstrander published a rejoinder to Meyer's review of D-degóir under the title 'The dictionary of the Royal Irish Academy.' In this able and in the circumstances restrained piece of work sixteen pages are devoted to refuting a number of Meyer's detailed criticisms and to pointing to inaccuracies in Meyer equal to Marstrander's own. This is of course the ordinary business of scholarship. It is the first part of the rejoinder which is required reading for anyone interested in the general problems of Irish lexicography and in Marstrander's own achievement.

Marstrander begins by pointing to the inadequate nature of the materials he took over from his predecessors. He expresses approval of the action of the Academy Council in hurrying on the publication of some of the Dictionary in order to retain Close's legacy. With this latter object in view, he continues, excerpting was for the time being confined to the letter D, especially the section d-di, and adds 'the present issue was thus mainly prepared in Christiania from the material collected up to the autumn of 1912 during the late autumn of 1912 and first winter months of 1913.' He had three assistants in Dublin, Maud Joynt, Mary Byrne and Eleanor Knott. In spite of their good work, however, he frequently had to go in search of materials himself, and eventually was so hard pressed that he could not find time to correct his proofs and purge them of the errors he would undoubtedly have found on a second reading. The large scope of the work is defended as follows: 'My simplicity (i.e. in believing that a large-scale work would be acceptable) may be explained by the circumstance that I come from a country where the task of producing national works is taken seriously, and can rely upon the support of the nation.' He is here referring to the sum of '£1,000 which after half a century's preparatory work the Academy expressed its willingness to grant for the printing of the entire work.' He concedes, however, that it might have been better to omit the proper nouns and give them in a separate onomasticon and to reduce the number and length of the citations. On the other hand he maintains that his general treatment of the material is the only correct one, and in his later notice of Fasciculus E in Norsk Tidsskrift (see above) he points with justifiable satisfaction to the fact that here, although a shortening has taken place, the general plan remains the same. In fact Marstrander laid down the lines for the arrangement of the material which have been adhered to ever since, both in the Dictionary and the Contributions. It may be added that he later (in the article mentioned above) expressed the view that proper nouns insofar as they are part of the linguistic material should have been included. In this he was undoubtedly right, and the meagre extent to which this has been done is a major fault in the work as it now stands.

The next part of the Dictionary to appear was that containing the letter E. Two explanations exist as to why this letter was dealt with instead of the rest of D. As Best has it: ' The material of the letter D having been deposited in Norway, Miss Joynt and Miss Knott had been at work on the letter E, which appeared over their names in 1932, under the general editorship of Dr. Bergin.' The prefatory note to the fasciculus says: ' Though considerable time and labour had been expended on the remaining portion of the letter D, it was thought advisable, in view of the great complexity of this section, to defer publication to a later stage.' At all events nineteen years had elapsed since the publication of Marstrander's D. The letter F, also by Maud Joynt and Eleanor Knott, appeared in two parts in 1950 and 1957, the interval in this case being twenty-five years.

If the Dictionary had continued at this rate the date of completion would have been so remote as to be of very little interest. However, in 1936 a suggestion had come from the Department of Education, inspired by Éamon de Valera, then President of the Executive Council of the Irish Free State, for the making available of additional lexicographical material as soon as possible. This was to take the form of ' a dictionary of a somewhat lower standard of meticulous scholarship than the Royal Irish Academy " Dictionary " ' (the quotation is from a report in the Academy archives). It was proposed that ' with the minimum of editorial revision ' the lexicographical material for the letters I L M N O P R S T U should be arranged and published within five years, the cost of the undertaking being £5,200, of which £2,000 would be spent on printing.' This took account of the fact that the letters A, B, C (in Meyer's Contributions) and part of D were already to some extent provided for and that work on the letters F and G for the Dictionary proper was at an advanced stage. The last to appear of the letters envisaged in this scheme, L, was published in 1966, thirty years after the original plan was drawn up. Since then the postponed letters, A, B, C, and the remainder of D have also appeared (finishing with B in 1975), the total time taken being thirty-nine years.

To explain if not to excuse this long delay some further facts must be added. The main reason for it was of course the disproportion between the size of the task and the staff available to carry it out, which consisted only of two full-time workers and a varying number of part-time lexicographers who worked on the project as and when they could spare time from their other avocations. Even allowing for this considerable problems still remained. While the ' lower standard of meticulous scholarship ' presented little difficulty this was not the case with the ' minimum of editorial revision.' True enough, under the new title Contributions to a dictionary of the Irish language there appeared the letter M in 1939, N-O-P in 1940, U in 1942 and R in 1944 (U by Teresa Condon, the others by Maud Joynt). But all of these had already been completed or partially prepared for publication as Dictionary (as was Mary Byrne's G, which eventually appeared in 1955), and were furthermore on the large and elaborate scale initiated by Marstrander. These inevitably set the standard for the remaining letters, the materials for which still lay untouched in the filing cabinets of the Academy. And an early experiment showed that simply to publish these (for the letters I L S T) as they then existed without further additions and editing would have been a mere waste of paper and printing. To take a simple case, there were for all intents and purposes no excerptions for the old-Irish glosses in Thesaurus Palæohibernicus, the idea apparently having been that each worker should excerpt these for the letter he was engaged on. In addition, there were many glossaries to edited texts to be drawn on, and the number of these naturally increased as the years went by.

Most important of all, the collections of the Reverend Charles Plummer, of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, had been acquired by the Academy on his death in 1927. Plummer had compiled his own dictionary (on slips) for early Irish, and this exceeded in scope and usefulness any excerpting that had so far been done. Not only was his choice of examples from among the usual early texts uncannily apt and illustrative, but he had worked through and indexed the law transcripts of O'Curry and O'Donovan, marking parallel passages and noting down the large number of legal terms which had been only partly catered for in the Glossary to the official edition of the Brehon laws. So valuable is this collection that it is possible to regret that it was not published as it stood when it came to the Academy in the first place. It was certainly impossible to contemplate publication of any dictionary material without including a large part of what Plummer had provided.

And so the new generation of lexicographers (for the earlier workers had all died except Eleanor Knott, who eventually retired after the publication of F) were faced with a dilemma. On the one hand they were required to make material available with speed and were even forbidden to do any further excerpting. On the other they were faced with the example of M, N-O-P, R and U, all of which had appeared in a form not at first sight distinguishable from the Dictionary proper; with the lack of excerptions for important texts; with the ever-increasing glossaries to published texts; and above all with Plummer's indispensable collections. There was nothing for it but compromise, and the Contributions for I L S T and eventually A B C and the rest of D are the result. The old dictionary plan was adhered to, Plummer and the glossaries used, and some unavoidable excerpting done.

With Myles Dillon as general editor (though necessarily in a consultative capacity only in view of his teaching commitments in Wisconsin, Chicago and Edinburgh) work on the Contributions proceeded. The letter T was arranged by David Greene and E. G. Quin, with assistance for a time from Brian Ó Cuív. This appeared in two parts in 1943 and 1948. I, issued in two parts in 1952, was arranged by Máirín O Daly and Anne O'Sullivan. Some work had been done on the letter S by Maud Joynt and Teresa Condon before their respective deaths. It appeared in 1953 under the general editorship of E. G. Quin, assisted by Máirín O Daly and Anne O'Sullivan.

In addition to their work already mentioned Maud Joynt and Mary Byrne had in the 1920's prepared a complete manuscript for the unpublished portion of the letter D, and this had been partially revised by Eleanor Knott. It was seen through the press with some necessary additions by Anne O'Sullivan and E. G. Quin in two parts in 1959 and 1960. The letter A, with the same two editors, appeared in two parts in 1964 and 1967. Meanwhile, Miss A. I. Pearson, though largely occupied with work on the catalogue of the Irish manuscripts in the Academy, had prepared a considerable portion of the letter L, on which Eleanor Knott had also worked, and this received its final arrangement from Máirín O Daly and Pádraig Ó Fiannachta and was published in 1966. For the lengthy letter C, which appeared in three parts in 1968, 1970 and 1974 the arrangers were Maura Carney, Seán Connolly, Próinséas Ní Chatháin, Máirín O Daly, Pádraig Ó Fiannachta and Anne O'Sullivan, and the general editor E. G. Quin. B (1975) was arranged by Maura Carney and Máirín O Daly. The few late words beginning with H found in our sources were edited by Maura Carney and published in 1976.

To the list of workers already given should be added the names of Conn O'Clery, Donncha Ó hAodha and Richard Skerrett, all of whom worked on various letters at various times. The only full-time lexicographers during the Contributions period were Teresa Condon and Anne O'Sullivan. The rest were, as mentioned above, part-time in varying degrees. All were paid small salaries, calculated in the case of part-time workers on the basis of the number of hours worked. This expense was met out of Academy funds, the cost of printing from a continuing grant from the Department of Education and the Close and D'Alton funds of the Academy.

Accurate typing and printing have done much over the years to lighten the burden of the lexicographers. The former was done in the early stages of the Contributions by Miss S. MacCarthy and Miss C. I. Houston, and then for a long period ending in the completion of the work by Miss C. Sheppard. A number of different printers have been used, and this has had the inevitable effect of varying type-faces and a general lack of uniformity in the appearance of the various parts. The earliest were printed by the Scottish firm of R. and R. Clark, later ones by Alex Thom of Dublin, the Oxford University Press, the Dublin University Press and the Dundalgan Press. A more serious drawback is the fact that the Dictionary and the Contributions have appeared in different formats, the former using a sixty-five-line column, the latter one of eighty-six lines, which makes for difficulty in binding. No doubt it seemed desirable at the time to make the Contributions look as different as possible from the original Dictionary, for the assumption was that the latter would be continued. Oddly, but conveniently, the letter F, which appeared as Dictionary, is in the format used in the Contributions.

MS. references not included in the above are by the library reference as: 23 K 42 (RIA), H.3.18 (Trinity College, Dublin), etc.

Citations from the Old Testament scriptures given without date are from Bedell's translation, 1685; those from the New Testament from O'Donnell's version, 1602.

Inflexion and gender of nouns, where given in square brackets, are to be taken as inferred but not proved for the word in question.

In the examples round brackets indicate superfluous, square brackets restored letters and words.

Translations printed between inverted commas are as given in the editions cited.

The sign = is used to introduce a version in the original language of which the Irish example cited is a translation (as in ITS xxix (Instructio Pie Vivendi), RSClára, Trompa na bhF., etc.).

The sign : indicates rhyme.

The sign ∴ indicates consonance.

Cross-references are given by means of a capital for the letter in question followed by column and line number.

A

A first letter of the Irish alphabet, and first in the a-group in Ogam alphabet. Irish name ailm, q.v.

In later lang. ă is used as glide with e before neutral cons. (see under e), and is used itself with follg. glide -i- before palatal cons. with increasing regularity from the O.Ir. period on; also as glide in O.Ir. before final -e, -i preceded by neutral cons. (daltae, daltai, etc.), see Thurn. Gramm. §§ 87, 98. ă appears for o in certain phonetic environments, §§ 81, 82, 95; on the alteration a/e (daig, dego; saigid, segait) see § 83 and Celtica iii 182; on the spellings au, ai before u-quality consonants see Thurn. Gramm. § 80. In the classical lang. ă alternates for metrical purposes with ŏ and ŭ (even in stressed syllables with certain limitations), and á with ó, see TD Introd. lxvi, IGT Introd. §§ 141, 143. Long á is sometimes spelt aa in O.Ir., see Thurn. Gramm. § 27.

In native words ă represents Indo-European ă* and ə*, Thurn. Gramm. § 50; original ā* in final unstressed syllables, § 93; original e* in certain proclitics (la, amm, etc.), § 115. It appears as a secondary vowel after syncope and loss of final syllables with nasals, l and r (immainse, cétal, arathar), § 112. It also arises with original vocalic sonants (other than i* and u*) in certain phonetic contexts, §§ 213, 215.

Long á represents Indo-European ā* and ō*, Thurn. Gramm. § 51, and also ă* after compensatory lengthening, § 125.

The diphthong aí, ái represents Indo-European ai* and oi*, §§ 66 ff., and aú, áu (archaic) Indo-European au*, ou*, etc., § 69.

In Latin loanwords ă represents ă, Ped. § 121, and somet. ŏ, § 122. Long á represents ā, § 126; and occasionally ă, § 121. The diphthong aí goes back to ae in saígul, § 132.

In a few early exx. a is apparently omitted before mo, see ZCP xix 365. a mo is not found in classical verse and the few late exx. found in translation literature may be due to English influence: a mo anoim, Desid. 2411. a mo anuim, 2419. a ar nAthair, Parrth. Anma 765. a mo Ṡethracha, RSClára 47^{a}.

2 a In O.Ir. also á (see Celtica ii 339-40), e (Thurn. Gramm. 285). Poss. adj. (proclitic form of aí, q.v.) of 3 s.m. and n. (leniting), 3 s.f. (geminating) and 3 pl. of all genders (nasalising). When a numeral intervenes between poss. and noun the usage fluctuates. The older is represented by a nda ara. LU 4729, the later by a da nduma, LL 1541, where the initial of the noun is mutated independently of the numeral. The poss. of the third person is also used in combinations such as adám my two, adád your two, adár our two. Similarly with trí. See Ériu xi 146 ff. and the numerals dá, trí.

For the forms in combination with prepositions see the several prepositions.

ad- prep. prefix used to form compds. See Thurn. Gramm. § 822; O'Rahilly, Celtica i 337f.; Breatnach, Éigse vi 339. In close compds. remains as ad- before vowels and earlier w (preserved as spirant b): adamrae (amrae), adblam (ad-folam).

The d is assimilated to c t, g, d, b, s, m: -accobra (adcobra), atrab (ad-treb), acarb, ag(g)arb (ad + garb), atód (ad-do-) apuide, abbuide (ad + buide), aslach (ad-slig), ammus (ad-mess). In the case of m, however, O'Rahilly, loc. cit., regards adm- as the regular development e.g. admass (ad + mass), admat (ad + muinethar), admall (ad + mall), admolaid (ad + m.). Before an original u in follg. syll.: audbirt, idbart, edbart (*ad-uss-bert), aupaid, epaid (ad-buith). Before r, l, n appears as á: áram (ad-rím), fo-álgim (*fo-ad-log-), áinsem (*ad-nessam). As perfective particle, see Thurn. Gramm. § 532. In pretonic position always ad-: ad-ella, ad-cobra, ad-gládathar, ad-slig, ad-midethar, ad-rími etc. except before t and d, to which the d is assimilated: attá, atá (ad-tá), ataimet (ad-daimet). For the forms with infix. pronouns see Thurn. Gramm. §§ 412, 413. The fact that ad- and ess- fall together before inf. pronouns has sometimes led to ad- being replaced by as- in pretonic position e.g. as-roilli beside ad-roilli (prototonic -árilli -áirilli). Sometimes ad- replaces in- in pretonic position e.g. ad-cumaing (prototonic -ecmaing), see Thurn. Gramm. § 842 B(1). Meaning orig. to, towards e.g. ad-gúisi hopes (wishes towards). In many compds. however it has a purely intensive sense e.g. adúath great terror; admór very great; admolaid praises highly. See various compds. below.

ad-cí sees. Frequ. (outside O. Ir. Glosses) at-c(h)í with meaningless infix. pron., in rel. with inf. pron. sometimes also as-. Prot. stem -a(i)cc-. In O. Ir. with depon. inflexion in subj. pres. and with redupl. future. In pret. active prot. forms only are found, the conjunction co n- being used where no other conjunct particle is present (deuterotonic forms occur in pass.). In perf. deut. with root -derc- and perfective -com- (ad-condarc etc.). There is no special perf. form after conj. particles. Note also ad-rodarcar can be seen, Sg. 172^{a}2. In later lang. ad- (at-) is gradually replaced by do- and the conj. stem acquires inorganic f-, giving the forms do-chí, -faic-, both with b-fut. In past tense the general independent form is ad-(do-) chonnai(r)c (from the perf.), the form after conj. particles -(f)ac(c)- (from the pret.), both with endings of the s-pret.

Apart from this construction special pret. forms occur mainly in the sense strikes, which is not found in the vn. ecmong (see (a) below). In the other meanings the pres. is frequently used as a historic tense (cf. Études Celt. iii 232). pret. 3 s. ad-comnaicc (happened), BDD^2 1478 (see note.) Vn. ecmong.

There are two meanings, (a) strikes (trans.), (b) happens. As prot. -ecmaic -ecmaing and vn. ecmong are found only in sense (b), and the s-pret. (found in O. Ir. glosses) only in sense (a) there may have been two distinct compound verbs. But sense (b) could have arisen from sense (a), where, on the other hand, a compd. of icc could have been influenced by or conflated with boingid or a compd. thereof. Treated as one vb. by Ped. (ii 555) and Thurn. (Gramm. 354).

áilges ā, f., later(?) u and o, m. The meaning and earlier inflection are against analysis as deriv. of álaic (cf. Desid. Gloss.) though the rhyming exx. (Met. Dinds. iii 62.107 and bardic verse passim) indicate long á-. The length-mark is not usual in early exx., and Thurn. Heldensage 69, on the basis of Corm. Y 62, takes as compd. of 2 ail and geis 'Schimpf-Bitte' (note that geis in general sense of request is poorly attested). Desid. Gloss. suggests compd. of áil and geis.

an- neg. pref. (IE vocalic *n-), appearing as an-, am-, in-, im-(?), é- before different initials. See Thurn. Gramm. §§ 869 ff., Dillon, Phil. Soc. Trans. 1944, 94 ff. Even in O. Ir. the original phonetic distribution has been disturbed by analogical formations, e.g. an- for in- before d, g (andach, anglan); an- for é- before c in nouns (aincél, aincride); both an- and am- before vowels (anecne, amulach). This becomes more widespread in later lang., where in addition to regular formations of the type éccóir, étrócar we find the unphonetic édaingen, édána, édlúith, édóchas, édóig, édomain, éiderb, éidrímtha (with extension of -d-), éigrinn, éscus (scís), étriad (anríad, v.l.): énirt occurs in Wb. The form in-, regular before d-, g- (indles, with recomposition indíles, ingnad, also ingnáth) appears later in infebda, infoltach (= anfoltach), inísel, inmall, inmálla, innáire, intinne (teinne), inúath; note extension of -d- in ind(ḟ)úar, while imbil is a possible ex. of im- before b- (see Thurn. Gramm. p. 543).

The forms an- and am- eventually become for all intents and purposes interchangeable in meaning (a), and many doublets arise (aindeóin, aimdeóin; anglan, amglan). But there are no exx. of an- before p- nor of am- before m-, s-, and t- (before i- only in amaires, before p- only in amprom, where prom is a loanword). Acc. to Thurn. Gramm. p. 104 the neutral quality of the nasal seems to have been preserved before palatal vowels in the early language (note also amraid, anbal, etc.). The later tendency is for m and n to be palatalized before front vowels and palatal consonants. Cf. ainfírinne, Wb. 2^{a}17. The form am- presumably lenited l, r, n. In the case of initial b- the group -mb- later becomes -m(m)- (aimbrit aimrid). In its later extension am- lenites all other consonants before which it occurs. The original mutation after an- in the case of f, g(?), c was nasalization (anbal, anglan, aincride). In the later language an- lenites b c f g m (cf. aincreitem later ainchreitem, etc.); t apparently remains unchanged (ainteist aintenn); an- before d gives an(n)-, this combination falling together with original an- before n- (aindeoin, -nn-; aindíaraid, -nn-; ainnert). In old compds. a long vowel in the second element is shortened (anbal, amraid with subsequent recomposition ainfíal, aimréid) (cf. indles, ingnad above).

In frequent composition with nouns and adjj., and rarely with vbs. (ainlenaid, anadnaid, anaibsigid).

Though a few forms like aineóil strange occur fairly frequently these seem to be gs. of the nouns rather than adjj. of the type sochineóil etc. However, énirt is no doubt correctly given as adj. i-stem. The same may apply to the later aimnirt. See also aindeis, aindílis (see aindíles), ainféich, ainéitid.

(a) not, non-, un- (aimecna, aimles, ainbthen, aincreitem, aindebaid, aindeóin, aindíbad, aindliged, aineól, ainétgud, ainféile, ainfis, ainteist, amaires; aimbil, aimdis, aimglicc, ainfessach, anglan, amraid etc. For exx. with é-, in- see Fasc. E, I).

(b) The (later?) meaning bad, undesirable, unsuitable (with nouns) is found e.g. in ainben, ainbreth, aindía, aindíl, anduine, ainécht, 1 ainfine, anflaith, anfolad, aingním, ainimme, ainmían, 1 ainrecht, ainríad, ainricht, ainríge, aintír, anchruth, antocad. Words with a(i)m- in this sense are less frequent (aimbés, aimbéscna, aimles(?), aimricht; the adj. ainíarmartach is derived from a noun.

(c) As intensive prefix great, very (see Dillon ad loc. cit.). Though this meaning becomes common only in the later language there are some early formations; inglan is found in SR, ind(ḟ)úar, innáire in LL, ingarg in Todd Nenn., though infebda, iníchtar etc. are late. The form. a(i)m- is not found with this meaning (aimlesc is for aidlesc), in which a(i)n- has the widest extension and is still current in the spoken language. The follg. are early exx.: anfann (usual from the mid. Ir. period on), 2 aingel (Corm. Y), ainéitig (LL), ainecla (CCath.). The follg. are later: anbrath, ainching, andána, aindíchell, aindíummus, andóchas, ainfergach, ainnert, aintreise. Some forms are of doubtful origin. Cf. an-, am-, dīultadaig gāidilge, amail rongab . . . nert ⁊ amnert, Corm. Usually spelt ar. air, Ml. 51^{c}2, 2^{d}2; er, 122^{a}16, BB 449^{a}10; eir, Ériu iv 180 § 39. The spellings air, er, etc. (more freq. in later lang.) and the modern pronunciation show that O. Ir. ar as simple prep. was replaced by a conflation of airi and fo(i)r (3 s.n. of ar and for).

In Mid. Ir. for and íar are frequently spelt ar. See III, IV below and the articles on these words.

In later lang. all pronominal forms influenced by those of for, giving or(u)m, or(u)t, air, uirre (uirthe), orainn (oirn. oirinn, O'Gr. Cat. 556.25), oraib (oirb, BColm. 100.3), orru (orra, orrtha), etc.

The presumed distinction between ar with accus. when motion is implied and with dat. when no motion is implied (Zeuss 622; with reservations Vendryes Gramm. § 283; see also Ped. ii 73-4, Williams loc. cit.) appears most clearly in the stereotyped phrases ar chenn towards, ar chiunn ahead of, before (see cenn): ar beolu towards, ar bélaib before, in front of (see bél). The dat. is usual in ar cach láu daily (see lá) and in ar thosuch (Sg. 203^{a}7, see tosach). Usage is less clear outside fixed phrases, and that of the various collections of O. Ir. glosses differs (the available material is also much reduced by the frequent identity of form of as. and ds. of nouns). The accus. is regular in Wb. in senses of taking away from and counting as, and also in glosses on Lat. ob, the dat. where the meaning is with regard to, instead of and in glosses on Lat. super. Both cases are found where the meaning is for the sake of, because of. In Ml. accus. is constant only in set phrases. The dat. is usual in meaning counts as, do-beir ar (for ?) calls and in glosses on Lat. dat. without preposition (ar gentib gl. gentibus, 78^{a}12, 89^{c}2) and where a Lat. compd. noun is treated as two words (arintinmlegun gl. promulgatione, 71^{c}18). In general use the meanings saving from, instead of, in meaning of, in return for, on account of, because of, for the sake of, for the purpose of are all found both with accus. and dat. In Sg. the meanings instead of and on account of are found with both cases. See also IGT Introd. § 130, Bard. Synt. Tr. 2–4, 17, 20 (where detailed rules are given for accus. and dat. both with simple ar and for compd. preps. such as ar aghaidh, etc.).
